THE END

"Papacito," Little Pancho Vanilla called with excitement, "I cannot find a pen or a pencil. We must write a letter to my reech Onkle Jose before the mail ees picked up een the village this afternoon."

Señor Vanilla yawned sleepily.

"Why all the rush, leetle wan? There will be another mail train next week. Eet can go weeth that wan," he shrugged.

"But, Papacito!" Little Pancho exclaimed worriedly. "Reech Onkle Jose has invited us all to spend a week at his beeg rancho. He says if he does not hear from us by return mail, he weel invite somebody else."

"Caramba!" Señor Vanilla exploded, leaping to his feet. "This ees the first I have heard of eet. We must act queekly. Your reech Onkle Jose serves the biggest meals and has the softest beds in all of Chilivania. Eet ees always most . . . er . . . stimulating to spend a week weeth heem!"

Señor Vanilla left his hammock and dashed into the house. Frantically, he searched through his desk for a writing implement.

"Ah-ha! Here ees a bottle of eenk!" he cried triumphantly, "but I cannot find a pen or a pencil!"

"We could not make a pencil, but if we had a goose quill, we could make a pen," Little Pancho suggested.

"Of course!" Señor Vanilla exclaimed. "There are geese een the meadow. Come!"

Before Little Pancho could reply, his father was out of the house and leaping over the fence into the meadow.

Little Pancho followed quickly and reached the meadow just as his father was about to catch one of the geese. But, suddenly, all the geese squawked loudly in fear and fluttered out of Señor Vanilla's reach.

"Bah! See what you have done!" Señor Vanilla stormed. "You frightened them away!"

"N-No, Papacito," Little Pancho said, his voice filled with fear as he pointed beyond his father. "Eet ees that beeg bool coming at us that frightened them away!"

Señor Vanilla took one look at the charging bull and ran behind a nearby tree, dragging Little Pancho with him. But the bull charged on, crashing into the tree and breaking the tip of one of his horns! Bellowing his rage, he charged the tree again, this time dislodging a broken branch, which fell on Señor Vanilla and stunned him for a while. Then, at last, with a snort, the bull turned and fled.

When Señor Vanilla regained consciousness, he was lying peacefully in the shade of his house.

"Mamacito and I dragged you here after the bool left," Little Pancho explained at his father's questioning glance.

"The letter! We must write the letter!" Señor Vanilla groaned, rubbing his head.

"Eet ees all done, and Mamacito ees on her way to the village weeth eet now," Little Pancho assured him.

"But . . . what did you use for a pen?" his father inquired with amazement.

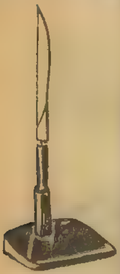

"The bool broke the top off one of his horns when he hit the tree," Little Pancho explained. "I pulled it from the bark, dipped it into the ink, and found it worked as well as a goose quill."

"Caramba! That ees magnifico!" Señor Vanilla crowed happily. "You have saved the day, my son, and also invented the first bool-point pen in history!"
